The patriotism of the people was at a white heat. In a variety of ways they testified to their admiration for the hero of the hour, and to their love for a country which now seemed to be passing out of its years of disorder and confusion and coming into an era of peace and prosperity. Great changes have taken place in the hundared years that have intervened, but we do not believe that the sentiment of patriotism is more intense now than then, or that the last president was inaugurated with greater enthusiasm than the first. The contrast between the event and the coming celebration is wonderful. The lives of very few individuals cover 'he entire period. In the case of the entire period.
